Who's that hiding behind Carolina Research & Development?

Wheeler Hill and USC: the Line

by Elton Manzione

The scene reminds me of an old man's mouth; with a lot of gum and a few teeth in between, only here it is a lot of vacant land with a few houses in between Stately old trees grow up out of the underbrush covering the vacant lots.

Years ago it used to be a pecan grove; the original Wheeler house still stands at the crest of Wheeler Hill as if brooding over the emptiness and desolation below. But a new and bright future may be in store for Wheeler Hill, a future which may establish it, again, as a viable community.

Currently the city is studying a plan which will provide a residential mix of single family dwellings, condominiums and apartments along with some low density subsidized housing. It is designed to be a multi-ethnic and multi-income community. It is an innovative plan to turn Wheeler Hill back into the viable community it once was; and it appears to have the approval of the University of South Carolina and Carolina Research and Development Foundation which owns most of the property on Wheeler Hill.

"It's kind of funny," one source said, "they tore it down and now they want to build it back up." And tore it down they did.

Back in the late sixties Wheeler Hill was a close-knit community of mostly poor black people. Many had lived on the Hill all their lives in ragged little wooden shacks with rows of flowers planted out front. It wasn't much, but it was home to the 400 or so families living on the hill. It was poor, but it produced lawyers, educators, doctors, chemists and ministers.

"Some people were born, grew up and died right here on the hill," Wheeler Hill Neighborhood Improvement Association President Bernice Martin said. But Wheeler Hill was in "Gamecock Country" as it were, sharing its border with the University of South Carolina. Wheeler Hill soon fell under the expansive eye of then USC president Thomas Jones, and the rape of Wheeler Hill began.

Back in 1965 a strange hybrid of sorts appeared on the Columbia real estate scene. The Carolina Research and Development Foundation was formed in that year to buy and hold property for future university expansion and in the intervening 12 years a lot of people have been trying to figure out just exactly what CRD is and why it was formed.

Many persons have speculated over the years that CRD was originally set up to evade the state limitation on bonded indebtedness. This ceiling on bonded indebtedness would, in effect, slow the rate of University property acquisition by tying it directly to the amount of tuition fees received. The private, non-profit, CRD would, however, face no such limitation. Harold Brunton, vice-president of business affairs at USC, has claimed publicly that CRD was created merely to alleviate the need for the University to use eminent domain, or condemnation, when it found it necessary to procure property. But Brunton, testifying during a court case, said CRD was organized to enable the University to purchase a piece of property for which it had no specific project planned; in other words a property for which no funds were directly available to the University.

Although Brunton has maintained steadfastly over the years that CRD was separate entity from the University, the relationship between the two is curious indeed and tends to belie Brunton's contention.

Nearly half of the CRD board of directors are university officials, including Brunton, vice-president of development C. Wallace Martin and current president of USC William Patterson. The corporation, which has somewhere in the neighborhood of $5 million in assets, has no office except for a few file drawers in Brunton's office and a file cabinet in the office of D.I. Fitzgerald, vice president of USC. If you want to call CRD you call the University, Harold Brunton in particular. CRD's address of record is the University Administration Building.

To say that CRD's success and growth have been phenomenal would be a bit of understatement. Since its inception in 1965 the corporation has grown from assets of $70,000, in the form of a lease on Woodland Terrace Apartments, to assets of over $5 million including the prestigious Senate Plaza. The success could best be explained by a review of CRD's board of directors.

In addition to Brunton and Patterson the group has included: David Robinson, a prominent Columbia attorney; Arthur Williams Jr., president of SCE&G; Jack Tobias, president and chairman of the board of Palmetto State Life Insurance Company, Dr. William Weston Jr., a Columbia physician; William Bruce, president of Seibels, Bruce and Company; Francis M. Hipp, chairman of Liberty Life, and James M. Hagood of First National Bank. In addition Willis Canty, of C&S Bank, John Lumpkin of South Carolina National and William Bruner of First National Bank have all served on the CRD board.

In its early years these associations proved invaluable to CRD in establishing a line of credit.

For example in 1968, when Hipp was on the CRD board, Liberty Life loaned CRD $376,000 for the purchase of the Woodland Terrace Apartments. At the time the foundation's only asset was a lease with the University on the apartments.

In 1969, when Hagood was a member of the board of CRD, First National loaned the foundation $250,000, unsecured, at prime interest rates. A few months later the bank again assisted

The public interest?

The state Public Service Commission, that council of buffoons and ignorami, sits now in August deliberation. Like a Roman tribunal, the commission amuses itself by listening in mock seriousness to a parade of witnesses who argue pro or con whether electricity rate structures ought to be changed. Specifically, the issue is whether the rate structure should continue to give discounts to large users of electricity.

Is it economically and ecologically efficient to have rates that encourage large-scale use of electricity? One argument says it is. Given our energy shortage and the need to increase coal usage, here is an ideal configuration: First, the electric utilities should be forced to convert to coal forthwith. Then, the rate structure as it is, complete with discounts for large users, will make sense.

To see the advantages of such a scheme, consider what will happen if the rate structure is simply altered to make large-scale use of electricity more expensive. Then industrial users might switch to oil or natural gas use. They could, of course, go to coal use, but the pollution caused by 20 plants burning coal would be infinitely worse than the coal pollution from one or two electric generating plants serving those same plants instead.

No, it makes eminent sense to encourage electricity use by industry, at least in preference to oil or gas. It makes sense only, however, if the electric power producers are required to burn coal. That's quite a large "if" -- State Rep. Tom Turnipseed has, in exercising his arts as a publicist, brought attention to the rather obvious fact that the Public Service Commission isn't about to force the electric companies to do anything. Half the members are on record as being in the pay of the electric companies, and the others perceive their sole task to be that of keeping a happy, greedy smirk on the ruddy face of every electric executive in the state. This is their high calling, their annointed Mission in Life, and what higher calling could any former state legislator and certified good ole boy wish for? The work's easy and the money is certainly good (you can see Commission members driving about town in their big black limos with special Public Service Commission license plates and a plethora of radio antennas attached to the trunk).

"...We don't really need a Public Service Commission. In theory, it's supposed to monitor utility costs, to disallow unjustified ones, and to make sure utility rates are reasonable. It does none of these things..."

We don't really need a Public Service Commission. In theory, it's supposed to monitor utility costs, to disallow unjustified ones, and to make sure utility rates are reasonable. It does none of these things. It depends on company records for its information, and even if the Commission had accurate data, it doesn't have the expertise to read and interpret it. A better idea is to have base utility rates determined by historical and econometric data, so they're in concert with the "best practice" of efficient utility performance. Then, once sound base rates are established, it should be written into law that price increases each year will be limited to the percentage increase in inflation, as indicated by the relevant price index. This law could be enforced by a small office, and violations should be punished by stiff prison terms for the executives of outlaw utility firms.

A story in The State newspaper purports to claim that the new state Department of Consumer Affairs is ready to get results on behalf of cheated consumers. I'll soon be testing that claim. Columbia is the home of some of the most incompetent and larcenous repairmen and mechanics I've ever encountered. The very typewriter on which I'm writing this column is only the latest example. It's a big old black Royal with a rare "nine-pitch" extra-large typeface, and it fell over. Then it needed minor repair, so I took it to a typewriter repair place listed in the phone book. The repairman wanted to do a $90 overhaul, but he finally agreed to a $58 simple repair (the typewriter only cost me $75 in the first place). So he took it and kept it for days, and the bill came to $61. But when I got the typewriter home, I found it was in worse shape than ever. The repairman had so botched the job that the typewriter is barely suitable for use anymore. Now I'm going back to the repairman tomorrow, and I'll bet a mythical $100 that he insists it was mere "coincidence" that the typewriter began performing miserably the moment I got it home from his shop. I'll bet he refuses to fix it right without charge. And I bet I give that turkey a piece of my mind.

I'm sick of this sort of crap. I just got ripped off to the tune of $400 by an auto repair shop that pulled the same trick. Every time they fixed one thing on the car, they broke another. When I brought it back and demanded that they fix it right, the swine dared to suggest that the part in question just "coincidentally" began to malfunction on the day when I got the car back from the shop. Perhaps one could believe that fantasy if it happened only once, but this repair shop, a large and lucrative operation, caused it to happen three times. Each time, they claimed the broken part just magically failed on its own, upon the car's arrival back home. And the worst part of it is that these thieves usually get away with their cheap and vulpine thievery.

I have my tales to tell, but so does most everyone in Columbia.

Chapman and the children

World-famous archaeologist Robert F. Chapman today announced a major new discovery when he unearthed a fragment of the United States Constitution known as the free enterprise section of the due process clause. Renowned in antiquity, the Constitution has been thought lost in recent times, except for occasional discoveries of other fragments. Paleontologist William Rehnquist, famed as the discoverer of two of those fragments -- the tenth and eleventh amendments -- greeted Chapman's announcement with excitement, and confirmed reports that the remainder of the Constitution may soon be found. "Search teams are nearing a breakthrough in their hunt for the second amendment and the fugitive slave clause," he said, "and when we get those, we think we will have the complete document."

—anonymous "news flash" circulating among South Carolina attorneys this week.

For anyone who had any lingering doubts about how U.S. District Court Judge Robert Chapman would rule on the Consumer Products Safety Commission's ban against children's clothing treated with the flame retardant Tris, the wondering is over. Chapman last week in a blistering order to the CPSC and the Environmental Defense Fund (EDF), who had joined CPSC in defending the suit brought by Springs Mills to lift the ban, ruled that the CPSC had not afforded Springs Mills "due process of law" when they imposed the ban without a hearing.

Recent studies indicate that Tris could cause cancer in humans as it has in laboratory mice, and some scientists estimate that as many as 170,000 children could be exposed to the dangers of cancer by either skin contact with or sucking on Tris treated garments. (Tris, which has been used as a flame retardant since 1972, has an organic structure similar to a pesticide).

But Chapman chose to ignore that evidence in arguing in behalf of Springs Mills that "the due process requirements of the Constitution do not fly out of the window when the rights of children come in the door. Even a person who admits committing the most grievous crime against a child," Chapman continued, "is still entitled to due process of law."

The Tris treated garments had been banned by the CPSC under emergency provisions of the Federal Hazardous Substances Act which allow the CPSC to ban a child's product without a hearing where evidence indicates that there is a substantial chance the product may be hazardous to the child. In all other instances the CPSC must afford a hearing before imposing such a ban. The effect of Chapman's order in lifting the ban is that Springs Mills will not have to repurchase some $2 million worth of children's Tris treated clothing now circulating on the market, which is exactly what Springs Mills was seeking to avoid.

In addition, the order will have a national effect in that other manufactureres of Tris treated clothing will go into other federal courts with the same argument. There is approximately $200 million worth of such clothing on the market all over the country. What that means is that the sellers of children's clothing treated with Tris will have a choice of either dumping the products on the market to avoid getting hit with a financial loss (should Chapman's order stand) or holding on to the products in the hopes that the manufacturer will eventually buy them back.

What was apparently instrumental in Chapman's decision was that manufacturers had been forced to use flame retardant chemicals in children's clothing back when the dangers of Tris were unknown. Regardless, it is difficult to imagine how Chapman can allow nearly 200,000 children to be exposed to the dangers of cancer in light of any mitigating circumstances. While Chapman made a big deal out of the fact that CPSC had violated the due process clause of the Constitution, it should be pointed out that the situation surrounding the ban was just the one imagined by Congress when the emergency provisions of the Hazardous Substances Act were promulgated.

It should be remembered that the EDF, as early as January, 1976, went to court in hopes of getting Tris treated garments labeled as such. It was only this year after studies showed that Tris was a possible carcinogen that the EDF and CPSC sought to have the products banned altogether. The Tris treated products now on the market, are not labeled. Consumers cannot know whether they are so treated. They could be out buying children's pajamas, for example, at what they consider a bargain, when in reality a seller is just trying to get rid of them.

But Chapman's order came as no surprise. Only a week earlier at the initial hearing, he badgered attorneys representing the CPSC and the EDF. "They (the rats) were fed that stuff twice a day, weren't they?" Chapman said at one point. "Can you imagine what would happen if they had eaten cotton twice a day? They wouldn't have lasted a week." At another point, when EDF attorney Robert Rauch said Springs Mills should have voluntarily removed the products from the market, Chapman was moved to say to him, "That's the dumbest point I've heard since I've been a judge." And later to the same attorney he said, "It's your fault you don't know how to practice law."

Chapman's sudden concern about due process of law is misleading when you consider that the judge, in all his glowing poetic legalese, is rather selective in his application of the Constitution. If you will remember the case of David Armstrong for a minute, you'll understand what we mean. Armstrong was the man who put a sign up on his property charging that South Carolina Electric and Gas Company had illegally obtained land from the State of South Carolina which bordered on his land.

The land was obtained to build a power sub-station. Armstrong was forced to remove the sign after a South Carolina court decided his First Amendment right to free speech was less important than the potential damage to SCE&G's business produced by the sign. (The company apparently alleged that all of its customers who saw Armstrong's sign would immediately go out and change power companies).

Armstrong marched into Chapman's court and asked that he (Chapman) give him some relief. Chapman refused to take jurisdiction in the case. Armstrong's Constitutional rights didn't concern Chapman in the least. As a matter of fact, Chapman's concern with the Constitution doesn't seem to spring until free enterprise comes into the picture. The unfortunate thing is that it may be a long time before Chapman's stupidity becomes apparent.

Oconee takeover

A member of a terrorist organization decides he is going to enter a nuclear power facility, hold technicians at gunpoint, and threaten to blow up the plant or somehow bring about a meltdown of the reactor core unless his demands are met. A likely scenario?

Not unlikely, if reports published in the Greenville News are accurate. Staff writer Chris Weston reported this week a Duke Power Company employee succeeded in penetrating the security shield around Duke's Oconee Nuclear Station two weeks ago during a mock exercise designed to test the plant's security systems.

An unknown number of Duke employees, posing as nuclear terrorists, attempted to enter the facility during a nuclear security test required by the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission. A "reliable source" told Weston one employee was able to enter the confines of the plant.

Duke officials have been predictably shut-mouthed about the incident. Employing a form of doublespeak popular with bureaucrats and corporate executives, Duke public information officer Alec Coffin would tell Weston only that "vulnerabilities were found and corrected" during a "vulnerability analysis" at the nuclear station. Coffin did confirm that Duke employees were used in the "analysis" and that those being analyzed were not warned in advance.

Two months ago, the General Accounting Office (GAO) issued a report critical of the security systems at U.S. nuclear power facilities and critical of the NRC for its failure to promote more elaborate safeguards against possible terrorist attacks. The NRC responded by requiring the nation's 64 commercially-operated nuclear plants to file security plans by May. Duke filed a plan, but the details are of course top secret, and it is unknown if the security system had been beefed-up prior to the exercise two weeks ago.

An NRC spokesman said last month new security plans would have to include measures which "generally speaking" would make the plants capable "of dealing with a determined violent assault of several persons who are well-trained, who could be armed with automatic weapons equipped with silencers and could have explosives."

Companies operating nuclear power facilities, including Duke Power, have continually assured the public their security systems are sufficient to ward off possible terrorist attacks. Duke's exercise of two weeks ago suggests such assurances cannot be taken at face value. Obviously the public cannot monitor secret security systems to assure their effectiveness; thus the public has little choice but to rely on the NRC and the power companies themselves.

Try subjecting that situation to a "vulnerability analysis."

Vaught vote

Due to discrepancies in the House and Senate journals, and tally sheets used during the election, there were several errors in our list of votes cast in the contested 15th circuit family court judgeship race, published last week in Osceola.

Senator Anthony C. Harris, D-Chesterfield, did not -- as we stated -- vote for Vaught; he failed to vote for either candidate.

The House Journal for June 17 shows that Rep. Jean Toal, D-Richland, cast a vote in favor of Vaught's opponent, Archibald G. Marshall. The Senate Journal of the same date indicates she voted for Marshall, and also that she abstained from voting. "I definitely voted for Marshall," Toal says.

Rep. Wade R. Crow, D-Marlboro, is shown in the House Journal as abstaining, but he is not listed among those voting or abstaining in the Senate Journal. Crow says he did abstain. "I could not support Judge Vaught, but I felt Mr. Marshall was not qualified," he says. Crow, who has been a strong supporter of judicial selection reform, supported a bill to postpone the election until January 1977. The bill was defeated a week before the elections took place.

Rep. Harriet Keyserling, D-Beaufort, is shown in both the House and Senate Journals as casting a vote in favor of Vaught. Ms. Keyserling says she was ill on the day of the vote and was in Beaufort, not Columbia, when the vote was taken. "I did not cast a vote," she says, "and I don't really know how I would have voted. I probably would have abstained." Ms. Keyserling could not explain how both the House and Senate tallies showed her as voting. The vote was taken vive voce, each member's name was called and the member responded with "Vaught," "Marshall," "abstain," and in some cases, "present." Although a number of roll call votes were taken during the day in various elections, the Vaught-Marshall race is the only one in which Ms. Keyserling is shown as voting.

Baker denies quote

Dear Sir:

It has been brought to my attention that an article appearing in the May 27, 1977 issue of Osceola quotes me as indicating that Mr. Edward B. Cottingham probably violated the State Ethics Act. I did not make such a statement or assertion.

In responding to Mr. Manzione's questions concerning this matter, I explained to him that the State Ethics Commission in the past has ruled that a public official or public employee may conduct business with the public entity he represents when such business is conducted through a process of public notice and competitive bidding.

As indicated in your article, legal work is not an area which lands (sic) itself to the public notice and competitive bidding process. The State Ethics Act anticipates such a problem in enabling a public official or employee to make a written statement of any action he must take or decision he must make which would "substantially affect directly his personal financial interest." The State Ethics Commission has further advised such public officials and employees that they must refrain from influencing any action or decision on these matters.

Neither the director nor the members of the State Ethics Commission utilize the news media to charge public officials or public employees with possible violations of the State Ethics Act.

Gary R. Baker
Executive Director
State Ethics Commission

Editor's note:

The article in question had to do with private attorneys who do legal work for the state highway commission. The thrust of the article was that many of the attorneys, who are chosen by the state attorney general's office, had ties with that office or ties with the state Democratic Party.

Mr. Cottingham, while serving as a state highway commissioner, received fees from the state highway commission for work related to highway condemnation cases. Baker was asked if Cottingham, as a member of the commission, could accept money from the commission for representing it in legal matters. Elton Manzione, who wrote the story, stands by the accuracy of the remark published as Baker's response: "It would probably be a violation."

The provision in the ethics law cited in Baker's letter is inappropriate to the situation. The article did not contend that Cottingham had made decisions in matters in which he had a personal interest; rather, it questioned whether Cottingham, as a member of the highway commission, should be allowed an exclusive franchise on all legal work involving condemnations in the highway district in which he lives, as was the case.

If such a situation is permissible under the ethics act, then we need a new ethics act.

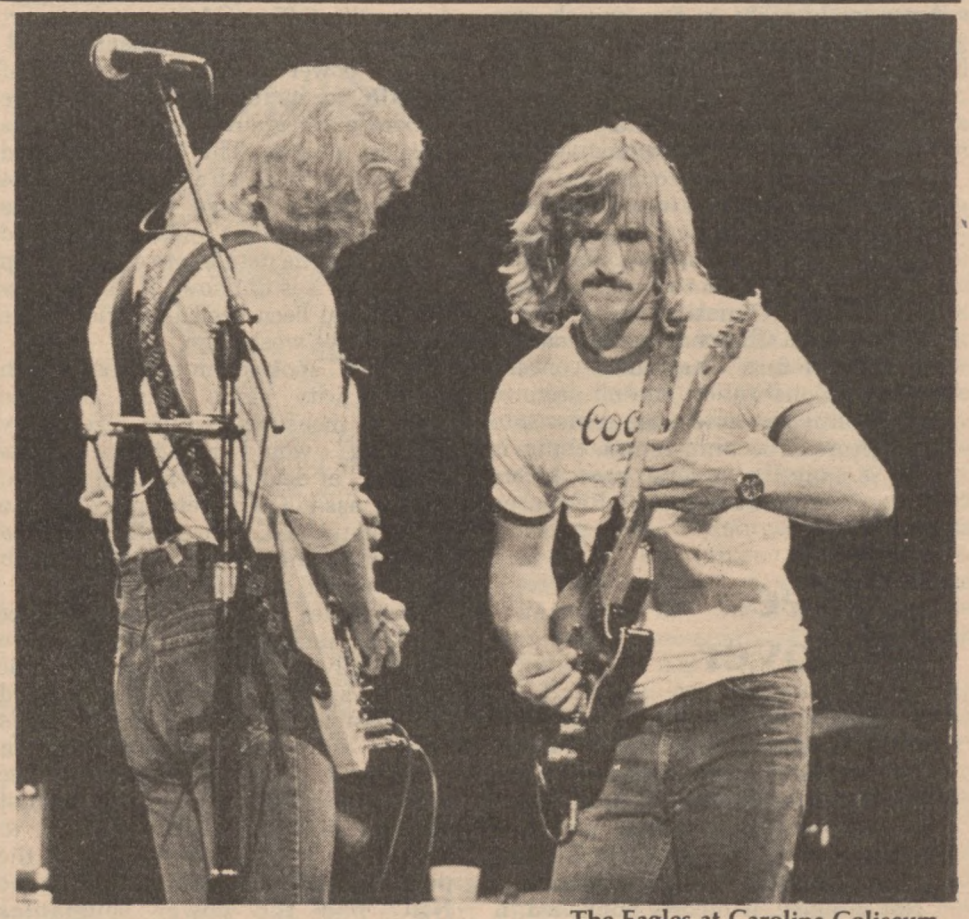
The Eagles in Columbia: no anger, exuberance, hurt or what have you

by Barbara Ballinger

The saga of the Eagles is a rock and roll success story. Initially hired piecemeal as Linda Ronstadt's backup band, they liked what they saw in each other and decided to back themselves up instead. They recorded their debut album for Asylum in 1972, and were quickly off to an auspicious start with three hit singles. Commercially, it has been all uphill from there -- read five more gold albums, including a greatest hits collection -- although their critical reception has varied. The group's immaculately crafted songs and clear harmonies have proved a consistently popular combination, but more than one critic has accused them of an emotional distance unbecoming to a rock and roll band. More on that later.



The Eagles at Carolina Coliseum

> "...Intensity in a performance isn't everything by any means, but without it the best constructed songs in the world lack the essence of rock and roll. My God, why bother without it?..."

The Eagles were originally a country rock band, but lately have headed into more of a straight pop and rock sound. When original member Bernie Leadon left the group, the country touch of his banjo was replaced by the rock and roll guitar of Joe Walsh, surely both an indication of and an influence on the band's intended direction.

Both the Eagles' strengths and their weaknesses were evident at their sold-out Coliseum performance June 21. From the first number they were right on, winding their way through the sinuous "Hotel California." Their harmonies were precise behind drummer Don Henley's husky lead vocal, and Joe Walsh and Don Felder on his double-necked electric guitar started off with some crisp guitar solos. They followed with Walsh's pre-Eagles "Rocky Mountain Way," to the approval of the numerous Walsh fans in the packed Coliseum. Again the guitarists alternated solos, with Walsh dominating on slide, silk with some raunch to anchor it.

A nice piece early in the set was a medley of "Doolin' Daltons" and "Desperado." Rhythm guitarist Glenn Frey, who with Henley is a primary songwriter/lead vocalist/spokesperson for the group, led into "Daltons" with a mournful harp solo; Henley sang of "easy money and faithless women" while Felder slipped in here and again with some elusive slide work. Unexpectedly the band was into an abbreviated version of "Desperado." They would elaborate on it later with Frey on piano, background vocals low and sweet.

The Eagles moved on to their hits "Lyin' Eyes," "Already Gone," and later "One of These Nights," tight and classy, the right tempo, the right volume, everything put together real nice. The audience seems to like it; am I the only one who thinks something is missing?

"Life in the Fast Lane," a rocker from their latest album, whose guitar intro and rhythm line is very similar to that of Fleetwood Mac's "World Turning," is begun, and again I am hopeful. But I think it's performed distantly, as if they really didn't mean it. I'm getting restless.

Immobile, shy-looking bassist Randy Meisner steps to the mike for his one lead vocal of the evening, on "Take It To The Limit." Perhaps it's his lack of posturing, or just some quality in his voice, or just that he feels what he's singing, but he reaches an evocative plane that no one else has touched this evening.

Then Felder, intense and hollow-eyed, starts a long, hot, promising guitar solo, looking like the guitar is playing him, drawing music from his fingers. The drums start crashing with him, things look good...but the band switches into a laid back "Witchy Woman," nicely done of course, the soft background wailing lightly audible.

Despite the high level of technical expertise the band is maintaining, despite the studio quality of their performance, something is still missing. Hearing them live turns out to be not really very different from listening to one of their albums...and yes, I think there is something wrong with that.

In my mind what rock and roll is supposed to be all about is feeling. Attaining the kind of sophistication the Eagles have reached shouldn't transcend the emotion—anger, exuberance, hurt, what have you — that's supposed to be there. That's a difficult quality to capture in a recording, but I expect it in a live performance by any group claiming to be a rock and roll band. Intensity in a performance isn't everything by any means, but without it the best constructed songs in the world lack the essence of rock and roll. My God, why bother without it?

I was disappointed in this concert. The Eagles did several encores - "James Dean," "Take It Easy," and Chuck Berry's "Oh, Carol." During those last numbers, the audience was boogeying, screaming and dancing, a lot of people enjoyed it; some good guitar exchanges were made. After 2 hours of facile rock, I didn't really care.

"When a group concerned with civil rights met in the governor's office several weeks after the shooting and suggested to Governor McNair that he should have a Negro on his staff--one who would understand the feelings of black people--he retorted, 'I know them. I grew up with them.' Recalling his childhood on another occasion, McNair commented about Negro neighbors, 'If they were sick, my mother took them to the doctor. If they got in jail, my father bailed them out."

USC and Wheeler Hill

the Foundation in its purchase of Senate Plaza.

If CRD displayed a close relationship with the university and Columbia's financial community it displayed just as close a relationship with the Columbia Housing Authority.

Robinson, who for years has represented the Housing Authority, was at one time its director and is generally considered to be the founder of the Authority.

In addition, C. Wallace Martin, a university vice-president and a CRD board member, was once the chairman of the board of the housing authority. Former Housing Authority Administrator John Chase also served as a vice president at USC.

Indeed early Urban Renewal projects, of which the Housing Authority was the administrator, seemed to display a peculiar affinity for the area around the University.

Projects around Pickens Street, the Colliseum, the ETV Center and Wheeler Hill itself were all undertaken under the aegis of Urban Renewal. One of the first housing authority projects in the city, University Terrace Apartments, was used as married student housing and later purchased by the University when the Federal Civil Rights Act was passed.

Several sources noted that for years the University and the Housing Authority worked hand in glove. "The Housing Authority was virtually an agent of the University for many years," one source said.

The University and CRD have also had friends on other commissions.

Dave Ellison Sr., who at one time was on the CRD board, also served as chairman of the ETV commission. The commission was the recipient of property from CRD.

Guy Lipscomb, a member of the CRD board, also served as chairman of the Museum Commission which was also on the receiving end of CRD property.

Brunton, in court testimony, admitted nearly one-third of CRD's original purchases went to Urban Renewal, through the Housing Authority, or to the Housing Authority itself.

One tract which was purchased by CRD for ultimate use as a parking lot was sold to the Ellison family a few years later.

It was against this onslaught of the political, financial and academic establishments which the poor, mostly uneducated, citizens of the Pickens, Main, Colliseum, Stadium and Wheeler Hill areas were forced to fight. To say it was a loosing battle would be an understatement.

This coalition, intended or not, also proved to be a convenient way of avoiding the provisions of the Federal Uniform Relocation Act.

Under the Act relocation payment and assistance to displaced persons is a pre-requisite to Federal aid. A state act, passed in July of 1972, requires similar payments be made by any state agency or instrumentality "whether the program or project is federally funded or not."

CRD, under the guise of a private organization, has never paid one dime of relocation aid to any persons displaced by it. In the federally-funded construction of the USC Nursing School construction of the USC Nursing School, CRD bought the property from the original owners. When application was made to HEW for the nearly $3 million in federal funds, the University indicated the previous property owner was "unknown" and said no persons were displaced. The University hid behind the "separate entity" of CRD to avoid paying relocation allowance to those persons displaced by the project.

"It's very typical of the way they operate. CRD buys the land, evicts the owners and the University applies for federal funds saying 'nobody is being displaced'," one source said.

In addition the Federal law requires that property owners be informed of the state's intent to purchase and of their right to relocation assistance. Again this was never done.

"The University never sent a notice of their intent to purchase, they just sent a note to the slumlords telling them to vacate the tenants," one attorney said.

Again the University hid behind the mask of CRD, a supposedly private corporation, and, theoretically, not liable to live up to that particular law.

But the University has suddenly become a good guy on Wheeler Hill. Bernice Martin talks of the meaningful dialogue community representatives have had with the University and CRD. And the planned development of the hill is indeed admirable, but is the motivation all that altruistic?

"Fat chance; CRD is holding land that the University is not going to buy and they're mortgaged to the hilt. They have to unload that property," one source close to the planned development said.

The source pointed out that the initial Wheeler Hill development study was financed by city council for $26,000.

"It's funny that Wheeler Hill couldn't get a dime from the city until the University decided it was in their best interests to dump the property."

Harold Brunton

"...CRD, under the guise of a private organization, has never paid one dime of relocation aid to any persons displaced by it..."

In addition, according to one source familiar with the development, CRD stands to turn a tidy profit on the sale of land on Wheeler Hill.

"Carolina Research and Development bought most of that property for a dollar to a dollar-and-a-half per square foot. The selling price looks like its going to be in the area of two fifty a square foot. That certainly looks like its more than the acquisition, demolition and holding costs they're always talking about."

But there may be a cloud on CRD's bright horizon and it all goes back to those relocation funds.

In a 1975 suit, Circuit Judge Clyde Eltzroth ruled CRD was indeed acting as the "agent" for the University, a ruling which could in effect make them liable for relocation payments to the 400 families displaced on Wheeler Hill and hundreds of those displaced elsewhere.

In addition Deputy Attorney General Victor S. Evans, in an interview with Osceola this week, said his opinion was that CRD was responsible for relocation payments.

"In effect the property is being acquired by the University of South Carolina through the Carolina Research and Development Foundation, which would make it subject to the provisions of the relocation code. I don't think there's any question about that," Evans said.

"They are an agent of the principal which is the University. They established the corporation for the purpose of acquiring property for the university. That's probably what the charter reads," and indeed that is exactly what the charter reads.

Evans' opinion is close to that expressed in a U.S. House of Representatives report issued just prior to passage of the Act in 1971:

"It makes little difference to a person required to move because of the development of a postal facility which method the postal authorities use to obtain the facility, or who acquires the site or holds the title to the property. Since the end product is the same, a facility which serves the public as a public building and is regarded as a public building, any person so required to move is a displaced person entitled to the benefits of the legislation."

It is a conclusion which may eventually be read in the Federal Courts.

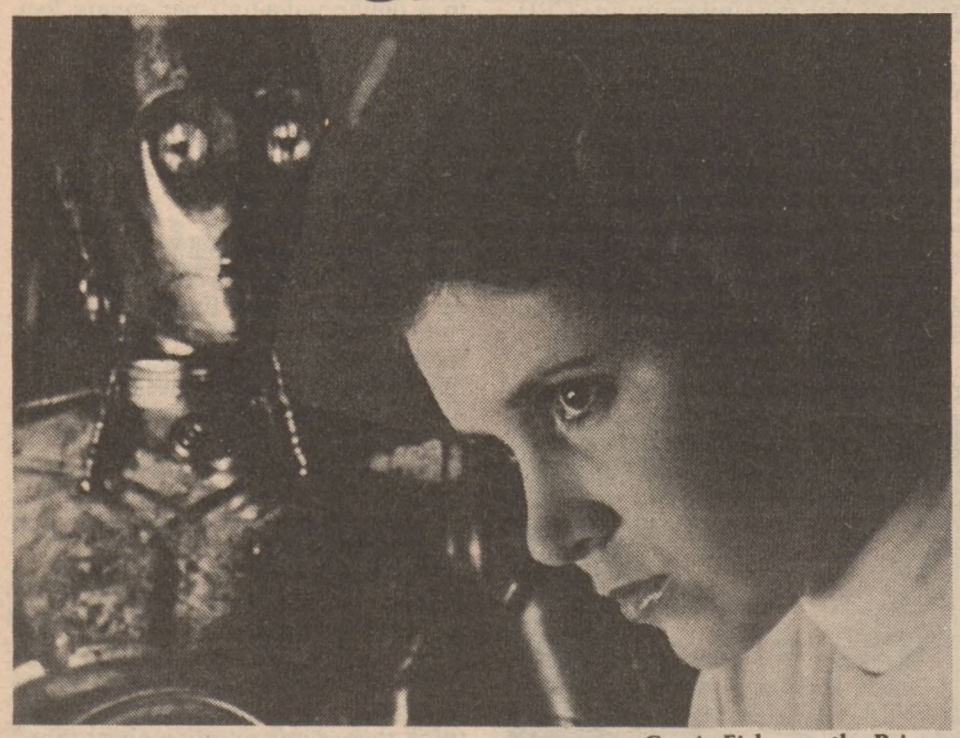
Cinema: "Star Wars" & a long, hot summer



Carrie Fisher as the Princess

by Karen Sundstrom

Star Wars is presently playing in Columbia at two theatres, and it is safe to say that if it continues to draw the number of people that came to see it in its first three weeks, it will still be playing somewhere in town come September. Like Silver Streak it may continue to draw "a good steady box office" (in the words of Jack Fuller Jr., of Irvin-Fuller Theatres), and may be moved to several theatres around Metropolitan Columbia, to afford everyone the opportunity to see it once or twice, or three times or four times...

"Summer-time and holidays are the times of year when you've got to make it in this business. If you don't make it then...," this from Tony Tracy of Irvin-Fuller. I.F. controls fourteen of the eighteen theatres in Columbia, and is not in any danger of 'not making it.' They have just completed a four-theatre complex at Spring Valley, at a cost of somewhere near one million dollars, and are counting on movies like Sorcerer, Exorcist II, Walking Tall, the Final Chapter, and The Deep, along with Star Wars, to keep their theatres full this summer.

Of the movies that will play in Columbia this summer, Star Wars may be the least offensive and the most popular, but in spite of the saturation advertising campaign of Twentieth Century Fox, and the rave reviews in magazines like Time which picked it as best movie of the year, it is not a great movie, and it barely qualifies as a good movie. However, it is unquestionably a popular movie, which is something else entirely, given the competition.

While in New York recently several friends urged me to see Star Wars there in 70mm and 6-track Dolby stereo sound (it is playing here in 35mm and 2-track Dolby). I passed it up for a movie I thought would not appear in Columbia, because I knew Star Wars would be here all summer. Now I wish I had seen it in N.Y., in the most favorable conditions for enjoying the film's only strong feature, the spectacular special effects.

George Lucas, who directed THX-1138 and American Graffiti, spent over ten million dollars on Star Wars, and a major portion was spent on developing and perfecting special optical effects, miniatures, and mechanical effects such as alien beings and the robot characters R2D2 and C3P0). There is no question that it is money well spent. The film would be insipid without them. The action that takes place in space is meant to be breathtaking and it is. The concluding dog-fight in space is the most exciting episode in the film. An earlier scene with Luke Skywalker gazing off into the evening sky on his home planet Tatooine, watching two full moons rise over the horizon is totally believable.

All of the film's 'hardware' is successful, and works to keep you from noticing that the 'software' (dialog, plot and characters) is bland, unimaginative and poorly thought out. Lucas claimed that he made the movie for fourteen year olds, but even kids deserve better treatment than this. The characters are cartoons in an apparently real universe and the movie suffers for it.

He has commented further that "kids today seem to be having a very boring childhood. Young people don't have a fantasy life, not the way we did. All they've got is Kojack and Dirty Harry."

It is impossible to disagree with his assessment concerning fantasy lives for kids, or adults for that matter. It has become clearer recently that people involved in television and movie production are responding to public reaction against entertainment that is brutally and needlessly violent and disturbing. Unfortunately that response may take the form of bland and needlessly boring 'family entertainment,' and 'escapist' movies like Star Wars with very little to say.

Flash Gordon and Buck Rogers serials of the thirties have been claimed as prototypes for Star Wars, and Lucas acknowledges his affectionate debt to them. Unfortunately he does not feel sufficiently indebted to find an actor able to portray a villain like 'Ming the merciless.' We get, instead, a seven-foot giant in platform shoes and black cape who never shows his face. Lucas has said that he would like Star Wars to be viewed as space fantasy rather than science fiction, because he doesn't want to be tied to "plausible science of the future on a fictionable basis," and it is an acceptable request. But changing categories does not nullify the need for careful development of believeable characters, and dialog that works to achieve total effect. For the first fifteen minutes I thought I was watching an expensive, well-done spoof of Flash Gordon, but I became confused and then disappointed as the jokes became predictable, and bits stolen from old Roy Rogers westerns, hard-boiled detective movies and present-day popularized pseudo-mysticism were thrown in haphazardly.

There isn't any acting in Star Wars, with the exception of Alec Guiness, and the new faces don't have enough strength or uniqueness to carry us with them as they walk through their roles. Guiness is said to have rewritten his own part, turning Ben Kenobi from an idiot hermit who inexplicably becomes a wise advisor, into a reserved man who has chosen an isolated life and now chooses active involvement. The other characters are cardboard cutouts, predictable and confused at the same time. Carrie Fisher as the Princess, bounces between inspirational symbol, and self-sufficient tom-boy without bringing off either one, and the characters played by Mark Hamill and Harrison Ford suffer from the same sloppy conceptualization.

Richard Lester's Three Musketeers is a good example of a popular, big budget, 'escapist' movie that was successful at the box office, and as a well conceived and executed movie, with no intentions to do anything more serious than entertain. Somewhere in the last few years, American audiences have been convinced that a 'fun' movie has no criteria to fulfill in order to be 'good,' and an 'art' movie is going to be so self-consciously 'good' that it's guaranteed to be ponderous and boring.

A sequel is planned for Star Wars (to tie up the sloppy loose ends of the first) and possibly a third film after that, so perhaps Lucas will take the opportunity to divert his attention to the direction of the movie. In the meantime Star Wars will be impossible to avoid, and will probably remain in Columbia until we are delighted to see it go. It may be the best we can expect this summer.

A number of films presently playing in theatres around the country will not make it to Columbia (Robert Altman's Three Women, Joan Silver's Between the Lines), at least not in the next few months, and the reasons why will be the subject of another article later in the summer. But while you decide whether or not to see Annie Hall for the third time, consider that you are also missing one of the best rock-concert movies made since Monterey Pop in 1967. The Grateful Dead premiered in N.Y. on June 1 and played to packed houses for two weeks. I saw it with a completely biased audience of Dead-heads, but the movie is so well done I think it would be welcomed by anyone who enjoys good rock and roll.

The distributors (Monarch-Noteworthy) are requiring that exhibiting theatres contract for the quadraphonic sound system that accompanies the print, in order to faithfully reproduce the carefully recorded sound track that is the heart of the film. 131 minutes of a 1975 concert at Bill Graham's Winterland in San Francisco are broken up with short cuts to interviews (of sorts) with people waiting to get in before the concert begins, spacey ladies in the audience, and members of the band. The film opens with about 5 minutes of beautifully done animation and concludes with a Dead encore. The band does about eighteen songs, including a complicated and beautiful version of Morning Dew that turns into a tremendous jam. Jerry Garcia directs and a crew of nine camera operators work to make a concert on film that comes as close as possible to the excitement and satisfaction of a live Dead concert.

Irvin-Fuller has no plans to book the film at the present time, but has expressed a mild interest. Led Zepplin's The Song Remains the Same remained on Main St. for several weeks, so perhaps they are willing to admit that the audience exists and will book a few films for that audience.

Next time you're trying to choose among the boring or brutal movies showing in town, consider calling Jack Fuller or Tony Tracy of Irvin-Fuller at 799-7139 and let them know that you are interested in seeing something more than what we are getting now, perhaps The Grateful Dead?

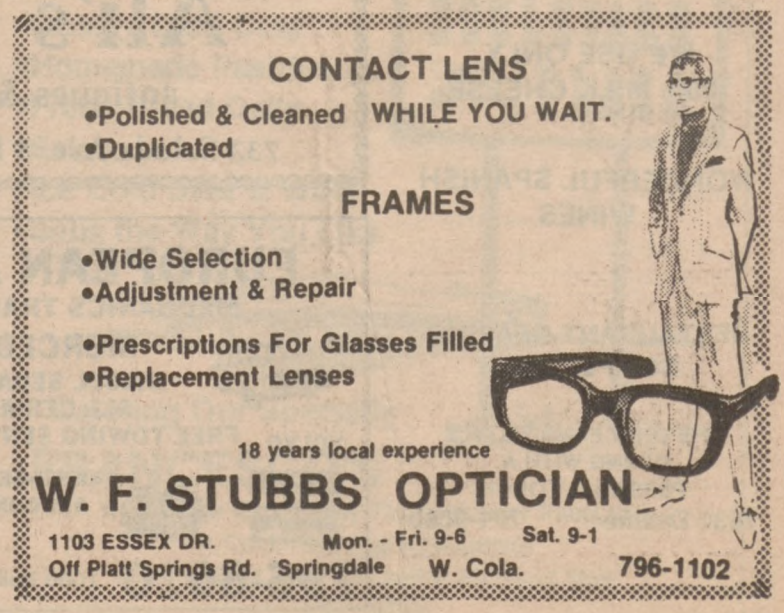
"South Carolinians have eaten cold gravy so much that any job, even one on which they are gypped and threatened, is better than none at all. Remembering the old, lean days and not enjoying the memory, they are willing to let the boss get by with just about anything. Helping the boss to get by with anything is where Strom Thurmond comes in."

—Robert Sherrill



The shallow

by Mike Smith

Is anything worth the terror of The Deep? ask the ads which bear a fishy resemblance to another film made from a Peter Benchley novel.

No, No, No! says this moviegoer, who wanted to see Star Wars in the first place. And nothing is worth the terribleness of it either -- not Jacqueline Bisset in a wet T-shirt, TV sex symbol Nick Nolte in his first film role, juicy performance by Robert Shaw, good underwater photography and, especially, the long lines at the box office.

I haven't read Benchley's novel of greed in the Caribbean, but if it's half as lively and adventurous as Jaws it deserves a better film treatment than it receives from this over-produced, presumptuous flick which director Peter Yates has concocted from a script by the novelist and Tracy Keenan Wynn.

After all, it's the stuff of Grade-B adventure flicks. Two divers off Jamaica come upon the coral-encrusted hull of a wreck and find evidence that: a) there's a treasure down there and b) there's something else down there too. So, they're off for advice from the local shaman, in this case veteran diver Romer Treece, a haggard old salt deftly played by Shaw, who befriends them, defends them and sends them home rich. Benchley has even added a nice "modern" touch, for half the treasure is a cache of ampules contianing morphine which, it is pointed out for the illiterati, is "halfway to heroin."

And with lines like that, no wonder this movie is tolerable only when the actors stick breathers in their mouths and take the plunge. The underwater photography possesses a crystal clarity which distinguishes it markedly from the graininess of the abovewater footage, and it's only underwater that anything approaching "terror" occurs.

Which, decidedly, is not what the film makers had in mind, for there is a perfectly repulsive subplot involving big buck Negroes "terrorizing" sweet, white, semi-nude Jackie with chicken parts and unsubtle allusions. For a brief moment, Louis Gossett, as drug-smuggler Cloche, appeared on the verge of pumping some life into this moribund film in much the same way that Richard Pryor salvages Silver Streak. In his first scene, Gossett flashes; unfortunately, he begins to take the proceedings seriously (Pryor didn't) and soon becomes as bogged down as Bisset and Nolte.

Beautiful Jacqueline Bisset is capable of giving good performances (Bullett, Day for Night), but here she is out of her element. Those looks of horror on her face as she dons her scuba gear are not the work of an actress who is subtly creating a character who fears what lurks beneath; rather, they are the sign of an actress' fear of water. It's her body which is being used to lure ticket buyers and it's her body which is exploited in some sadistically disgusting business with Cloche, but so vapid is the character she's given to impersonate that it's possible to leave the theater thinking our heroine is named "Girl."

The greatest mystery in the film is the exact relationship between "Girl" and David, who, as embodied by Nick Nolte, is a boring, cross-eyed man whose financial cravings are greater than any other he might (possibly) have. Nolte is a greater deadweight than the hull of the ship which contains his fortune.

Jacqueline Bisset

> "...this movie is tolerable only when the actors stick breathers in their mouths and take the plunge..."

Dramatically, the film belongs to Robert Shaw, one of those rare film actors who keeps getting better and better. He's redeemed many a film in the past (The Sting or Taking of Pelham One Two Three among others) and he tries valiantly here but to no avail. His Treece is wise and crusty and is about the only thing in the film with any depth to it. Shaw has the uncanny ability to never let us catch him acting, and Treece is his most exciting performance since his legendary portrayal of Henry VIII in A Man for All Seasons.

Mercifully, in a brief role, Eli Wallach is quiet and restrained, instead of his customary gutsy and explosive, so he is a pleasant surprise--the film's only one.

Director Yates gained a considerable reputation for his thriller Bullett, certainly a "prima donna" among auto chase flicks, but his work here will do nothing to raise him out of the ranks of a one-shot winner. The man who teased us with Bullett should just intuitively know that terror is created by withholding information from an audience, not rubbing our noses in nasty details. And Yates seems to have lost even the ability to provide a straightforward picture of events. The climax of the film is so convolutedly photographed that the action is obfuscated, and uncertain, and that climax, after all, is what we all paid to see.

It's a case of a pig's ear posing as a purse. The Deep probably violates every truth-in-advertising law on the books. It desperately tries to exploit the Jaws mania -- in the casting of Shaw, the reliance on Benchley, and the ads of a lone woman in water (only the shark is missing). It tries desperately to be that movie but amounts to no more than an old consumer rip-off -- a bait and switch operation.
